FROM FJORD TO FARMLAND - FROM FARMLAND TO NATURE

Originally, Sybergländ was a shallow fjord lying between Hindsholm and Funen, but it was drained in 1812. It became an area of meadows and grazing for many years, encouraging a rich diversity of plants and birds.

By the mid-1920s, pumps had been developed that were efficient enough to drain Tårup Strand completely, enabling wheat to be grown here. That meant the end of the meadows and the birds that thrived in them.

The area has been restored to nature now, with the meadows once again grazed by cattle and a large variety of birds can be seen all year round.

When Kerteminde Municipality restored the area, three "target" species of flora and fauna were selected: the lapwing, natterjack toad and broad-leaved marsh orchid. The objective was that these three species would be attracted to and breed in the area. Only a few years after restoration was completed, all three could be found here.

THE LANDSCAPE AND FUNEN PAINTERS

Sybergländ got its name from the renowned Funen Painters, primarily Fritz Syberg (1862-1939) and Johannes Larsen (1867-1961), who drew their inspiration from this rich landscape with its meadows, fields and pollarded trees.

Syberg had a little transportable studio built, which he called, Villa Hjulben, pictured below. You can see a reconstruction in Sybergländ. Villa Hjulben protected Syberg against the wind and weather as he worked through the seasons sketching the landscape.

There's more information on the Funen Painters at www.johanneslarsenmuseet.dk

Johannes Larsen: Bygevej i april (cloudy weather in April) 1901-07. Many of the paintings from the area give an impression of how the landscape looked in the time of the Funen Painters. This painting was used to a large degree as inspiration when recreating the landscape.

Videnskaberne Selskabs Kort (the scientific society's map) 1780. A shallow arm of Odense Fjord separates Hindsholm from the rest of Funen. When it was drained in 1812, it provided farmland but at the cost of its original nature. The red square shows the boundaries of Sybergländ as they are now.

Including: Sybergländ has a spacious building with information boards and facilities for eating, shelters and no less than two birdwatching hides.
